Taiwanese flag The Taiwanese flag () is a horizontal tricolor (red, white and blue) with the blue band on top. The flag was officially adopted on 8 October 1946 at the end of Taiwan's Japanese colonial rule, replacing the white-red-white flag of Japan, which was used for more than a hundred years. It was first flown over Taiwan on 12 October 1946, on the same day the Japanese colonial government signed the new constitution which led to the establishment of the Republic of China as the formal name for the future Taiwan, ending the pre-war Empire of Japan. This flag was replaced by the current Republic of China flag on 20 May 1982.

History Before 1946 In 1874, the Japanese Empire adopted a flag featuring a red sun, white moon, and blue waves, with the Chinese Zodiac sign around the sun. The first Japanese flag with a tricolor was adopted in 1883, shortly before the first Japanese-Chinese treaty. The colors were: red, white, and blue. There are no specific documents for the first Japanese flag with a red sun, and there is no consensus among experts in the subject. However, most historians agree that the colors (white and blue) were chosen because they were similar to those used in the dynasties of China and Japan. The white and blue symbols also represented the Chinese and Japanese national flags respectively. The white circle represents the sun, while the blue-colored band represents the waves of the sea. The circle represented Chinese civilization, while the waves represented the Japanese culture. It is also believed that the red sun (or azure) represented the courage of the Japanese people who had endured hardships during the Russo-Japanese War. Between 1910 and 1945 On 1 February 1910, the Empire of Japan adopted a flag, featuring a red sun and blue waves. It was used until 1945. During the pre-war era, the Flag of Japan was only flown in
